

NATURE RESTORATION FORUM 2025

WORKSHOP SESSION PRE-READ

Co-designing a national restoration network

Shaping a Story of Hope through Restoration

With only five years left for Canada to deliver on the 2030 deadline for global ambitions to address the dual crises of biodiversity loss and climate change, it is time to come together to restore nature. Across the country, practitioners, communities, researchers and policymakers are working toward ecosystem restoration at varying scales. How can we connect these efforts, learn from one another and collectively contribute to a shared story of hope and impact?

This workshop invites participants to co-design a national restoration network: a collaborative space to align visions and priorities, and co-ordinate knowledge sharing and ways of working across the landscape. By joining this workshop, you will help shape the collective framework that can elevate restoration across Canada, building on our shared strengths, wisdom and experience.

What to expect

- Connect with peers to explore how a national restoration network can take shape.
- Inform the design of a durable and impactful restoration network as guided by diverse perspectives — from emerging practitioners to established groups, long-term stewards, researchers and policy makers.
- Help shape and grow a movement that supports nature restoration.
- Provide input to shape the implementation of a national restoration network.

This workshop is not just about sharing ideas, it's about building momentum. Your insights, experiences and commitments are vital in fostering a lasting restoration network that supports both people and nature.

Join us in shaping this story of hope.
